Why It's Important: After the GameStop battle with retail traders, Citron Research announced it would no longer publish short seller reports, instead pivoting to covering stocks it thought could see positive returns and be multibaggers.

In June 2022, Citron Research called out the valuations of Bitcoin (CRYPTO: BTC) and Ethereum.

"As ETH still trades above 1000 with a market cap of 140 billion. We say WTF?" Citron tweeted at the time. "Every high-flying real software/cloud company is trading back to pre-pandemic levels which puts ETH at 200 (which is still expensive)."

Citron called out Ethereum due to its lack of use cases and being only used "to buy online collectibles," in possible reference to non-fungible tokens.

cases and being only used "to buy online collectibles," in possible reference to non-fungible tokens.

"This has reignited our flame for short selling because it proves there are many stocks out there that are elevated on the misconception that 'someone else did the homework.' We will release one soon," Citron tweeted Monday, suggesting a new short report is forthcoming.

Ethereum traded between $1,025.68 and $1,241.18 on June 15, 2022 and trades at $1,241.18 at the time of writing. This means that anyone who bought Ethereum after Citron announced they were short would be profitable on the opposite end of the short seller's trade.

ETH Price Action: Ethereum is trading at $1,241.18 versus a 52-week range of $896.11 and $4,891.70.
