

Title: After Elon's whole ordeal with Twitter & the accusation of bots I was looking at some accounts of companies (not going to name specific names but many were blog type companies that offer financial advice) that constantly sponsor posts on Twitter, Reddit, etc. Why did I do this?

For one I kept seeing their names due to their aggressive "advertising" and with the Elon information freshly rattling around my regarded brain it made me wonder why they would constantly do this if they supposedly have hundreds of thousands of followers (and more for some)?

Growth? Sure. But to the point it caught my attention because it's annoying? Ehh.

I mean why would they need to if they have that large of a base already? My grandpappy always used to tell me that I have a waterbed for a head. That AND that if you have a large Twitter following and put out good content then organic growth is the best "bang for your buck". Let people share your article's naturally right?

So again, why so aggressive? I started looking at the engagement and many of them like their own tweets. Like all of them, along with many of the exact same names. So I clicked on their profiles and they all follow each other. And that's it. Bots or burner accounts.

With like no likes/comments or engagement that I could find or they really want to make us/save us money. Like REALLY bad. One might say desperate. Like to the point they have to spend more on fake followers, promoted posts, etc than they can possibly be making via ad revenue themselves.

So they must really care about us is the take away here guys. I bet it's Bruce Wayne. Such a Selfless act.

Anyway, sorry for rambling, i'm a loser with no social skills so I decided to share with you guys instead of writing it the wall of on a Truckstop bathroom.

By the way, my granpappy never told me ANY of that. Totally fooled you suckers. What an M. Nightshamalan type twist a'miright? But for real, before he died in the 90's he told me to tell you all to go DRS your GME.
