Any short squeeze is predicated on an awareness that shorts will not be able to close their positions. This is because it relies on a shortage of available shares to cover, well past the "fair value" price of the stock. This could happen for a variety of reasons. If a huge short position is revealed at a price the stock won't see again due to a change in company fundamentals/outlook, this would trap shorts in a losing position. Additionally, the disclosure of an entity that controls enough shares to make covering impossible given the SI% can have a similar effect.

Will we see a realization in the greater public that the DRS numbers and current SI all but guarantee a massive short squeeze leading to FOMO?

We will of course DRS all outstanding shares eventually, but did this failed swap that ostensibly caused a spike in reported SI accelerate our journey? Buy.Hold.DRS GME.
