

Title: How GME can be used by Cathie Wood to get Elon Musk in bed. {Humor that might work, for reals.}

GME. I needed to get that out of the way. It feels like typing GME should be enough, and all the gizmos in the brain spin up, and everyone reading those three letters GME soon receive our creator's call to destroy the devils on Wall Street.

It's not the easy though.

As far as I can tell, Cathie Wood makes funds that are basically, "Hey, maybe throw your money at this. If that doesn't work, then try this over here. No? Well, what about this?" With stonkiness disappearing with money tightening to recalibrate the global currencies power structure, Cathie Woods needs a win to reassure her followers that prior success was because of her brilliance rather than debt expansion. She also needs to prove to E.M. that she has an inkling about real economic needs for the future.

This is how GME becomes relevant to Cathie Wood's ARK Invest vehicle. You see, people who aren't robots need more than batteries and an oil change. In fact, real people need more than the "necessities" that too often overly narrow the field of view of society planners. Believe it or not, people need entertainment of some kind. Diversity of entertainment is important. Think about the diversity of genre for music, movies, and games. The word genre really means that variety is given to offer enough selection to keep a majority interested.

The problem with "efficiency" metrics in something like the gaming industry is that gaming, or any kind of entertainment, appeals to imagination, and no one imagines precisely the same thing.

What entertainment consumers need is an outlet for diverse products that will appeal to the largest audience. GME so happens to have that criteria as part of its gameplan.

Let's get back to the point stated in the title.

GME is one investment solution to a bigger question. What do real people need? Someone like Elon Musk grapples with this question while trying to design a future on Mars, or wherever SpaceX might go. There are no GameStop stores on Mars ... yet. There never will be if planning is not done to make resources available for it. Mars citizens definitely won't want to live life in a protective cocoon roaming a small space of a shelter with worm-like motions. Mars citizens will want to walk places that offer reasons to go there. Mars citizens will want some Earth-like normalcy in regard to the business-consumer relationship modern culture has brainwashed them with.

GME is more than a store. It is a destination that offers select entertainment products with more diversity than a single entertainment publisher can offer. The destination might be a store, but it could also be an internet hub, a mobile app, a gamer zone in school, or wherever else. GME is a place to go with reasons to go there. People need that. Earth people. Mars people. Billionaire people. Po' people.

An ARK Invest fund designed by Cathie Wood that proves feasibility, viability, and success that would fit into Elon Musk's plans for the future of humans is the only way CW can get EM's attention at this point. The nice part about this is that a future human landscape design will still need things offered by a company like Bed, Bath, and Beyond. That's right! Beds. GME gives proof that Cathie Wood is truly thinking logically about supporting future humans, by recognizing the entirety of human need. All the other stuff included means a bed for Elon Musk to get into as well.

It's crazy, but it just might work!
