

Title: The Boa Constrictor (individual investor) first strikes at its prey (buys shares), grabbing it with its teeth (DRS), then proceeds to constrict the prey (HODL & shop) until death (margin call) before consuming it whole (liquidation).

Ask yourself these questions.

1. Why is so much time/energy/money being put into convincing the average person that a supposedly dying used video game business is a terrible investment? I haven't seen this level of effort with any other failing business of late, have you?

2. Why is so much time/energy/money being put into creating a constant negative narrative for a debt-free company with large cash reserves that's clearly doing a fantastic job of transforming itself?

No business would spend its time/resources on something like this unless its bottom line was being severely impacted (Melvin■). At the core of this, GME has been blessed with a legion of loyal individual shareholders that now threaten the existence of certain (mayo-lovin') big money firms. They dump the price, it's bought and held. They let the price run, fomo kicks in and shares are bought and held. There's literally no way out of this. Their collapse ultimately risks the average person realising the U.S stock market is a rigged machine. The cost of that outcome far exceeds a skyrocketing stock, so skyrocketing is inevitable IMO.

Not financial advice, but keep doing what you are doing, every day is a step closer and look how far you've come.
