The name of the game is **continuously kick the can****.

It's called CNS **continuous net settlement** for a reason.

1.Deliver 2.borrow 3.lend, go back to step 1.

We left the gold standard in 1971 where the USD was once backed by gold. After that point, the dollar was backed by the **future** taxes of the average working US citizen.

Value became purely speculative. The value of your assets became speculative. Options speculate things. Buying shares through brokerages **doesn't yield you a share.** It yields you the **right** to a share.

You buy a share with money, the market makers take your money and buy options. Those options are then continuously rolled in order to stay delta neutral while keeping a continuous rolling settlement of deliveries. What **isn't** talked about is they also stay **theta neutral** to strip the time decay factor, so both time **and price** are neutral.

That's where swaps come in... Swaps fuck with the charts because the time factor for options speculation is continuously being altered and rolled to a future date. It plays with the scaling of the charts. By altering time, you also invariably alter price. What you're looking for is the point of space and time where things become equally balanced and true price discovery happens

Poor fiscal and monetary policy combined with corrupt politicians that have been bought and paid for by Wall Street will eventually result in fatal repercussions.

And everyone wonders why GME runs up 25% suddenly and dwindles back down to where it started. Meanwhile, MSM pushes false narratives and trash talks companies because the majority of people don't understand calculus and monetary policy.

**(Why is "MO-ASS" a no-no word? Really mods?)** is inevitable... Tick tock
