Whales would also be good - but the one part of the scenario with GME that makes no sense is the absence of medium sized players buying substantial chunks of the remaining shares. People can see it's heading towards being fully DRS'd, much of the DD has turned out to be correct, and yet there's not some substantial buying pressure.

Theories:

- * there is substantial buying but it's all being routed off exchange
- * everyone is tapped out either from buying GME before or from recent losses elsewhere
- * anyone looking to buy large amounts now is cautious of potential lawsuits from SHFs in case they cause some form of breakout - can't really see how they could be sued for simply buying stocks, but truth and correctness doesn't mean much if someone wants to tie you up in legal knots
- * things are happening that are simply not being reported correctly.....

Any other ideas? Why no whales or sharks at the moment?
