Some highlights from Dr. T's blog post:

"If a Reddit moderator is saying that no one is allowed to post about DRS on their subreddit because it constitutes financial advice either 1) they are using "financial advice" in a context that would not be regarded as a regulated area; or 2) they completely misunderstand that DRS is a generic term and not connected to any particular investment."

"In summary, to be "financial advice" or legally considered "investment advice," two elements need to be present. First, it needs to be about a specific investment (like naming a company's stock). Second, it must be directed to a specific person (like a paying client) who can take action on the advice."

"If you "DRS" your shares, they are directly registered in your name, and you have control over them. You have all the rights of a shareholder and none of the hazards of being an entitlement holder. You shareholder vote goes directly to the company without needing a proxy. The dividends you receive will never be "payments-in-lieu" that could end up being taxed as ordinary income. You won't pay for shares then get hit with a "failure to receive" because your broker's trading partner "failed to deliver." Even if it is in your best interest to use DRS for your investments, it will never be in the best interest of your bank or broker – they risk losing revenue if you wave ba-bye with your shares. And that's the only reason I know for someone to attempt to censor your freedom to speak about DRS anywhere, anytime."

Let me repeat some of that last one:

"Even if it is in your best interest to use DRS for your investments, it will never be in the best interest of your bank or broker – they risk losing revenue if you wave ba-bye with your shares. And that's the only reason I know for someone to attempt to censor your freedom to speak about DRS anywhere, anytime."

I encourage everyone to read the full blog post, it's not lengthy and it's crammed with good talking points!
